I Have a Photograph

By Sandra Ayres

I have a photograph, taken in 1988, which I love as it is of my paternal grandparents with my first child. It is a simple photo, yet it evokes many, many memories that enrich the telling of the family story.

Grandpa Mason has his arm around Grandma, as he so often did. They had been married 59 years when the photo was taken. I am sure the strength of their marriage was part of why all their children had long marriages.

Grandma has Alex in her arms. Something I treasure. They were the first family to see him after his birth. They even extended a visit to the Lower Mainland to have that privilege as he was not accommodating in arriving on time. It meant the world to me for them to see him first; only later was I told they stayed longer than they intended to do so.

Behind Grandma is a quilted pillow. It stands as a reminder of the hobby she loved. Each grandchild received a quilt, made with love as wedding gifts. Often Grandpa would cut the pieces for Grandma to sew. Great grandchildren would get baby quilts. Pillows and even cheese boxes were quilted. This only ceased when it was not possible.

In the top corner is probably the best story of all. There sits a silver and white teddy bear. He is not old; he is not the child's.

My Mom had called one day and through the course of our conversation she lamented that once again she did not know what to get Grandma Mason for Christmas. I was eager to tell her what I had planned that year and why a teddy would be a great gift.

I do not recall just what prompted our conversation to get on the subject but Grandma had told me about the only teddy bear she had ever received. She was especially fortunate that Christmas for she had received not only a bear but also a doll. It came to pass that she learned that the little girl down the road had not received a gift at all that Christmas [this would have been before the Depression]. It troubled Grandma so she, as a young child herself, made the ultimate sacrifice. She gave her teddy to the little girl, to make her life brighter. I still recall Grandma getting quiet as she said to me, "I never received another teddy bear".

Mom became quiet on the phone. In a soft voice she asked if she could have the privilege of giving Grandma a teddy. I generously obliged.

That teddy sat on the top of the chesterfield for as long as Grandma lived in her home. After Grandpa's passing, teddy was a comfort to Grandma, serving as a great hug partner on those times when she needed one and no one was around. It now sits in my parents' bedroom, a testament to love and caring from one generation to another.
